

Editorial

Climate change actions now appear to be imminent with the planned Paris meeting later this year to set specific timelines for various regions of the world for actions. However, there are rumblings among nations with specific target dates for developing economies and loose ended targets for developed economy. This is not going to be workable if adapted in Paris. Climate is everyone's concern so is poverty as well; hence countries such as China, India and Brazil while trying to push their economy to resolve local economic problems, are naturally opposed to the skewed nature of present draft discussions. Rich will have to give in for the sake of overall global well being in the long run!

The present issue is the last one for the current calendar year and we wish the readers respond with useful comments to further improve the contents of the Journal that has received good response over the last decade plus years it has been in print.

Have a nice reading.

October 1, 2015

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read 'V. Subramanian', with a long horizontal line extending to the right.

(V. Subramanian)

Editor-in-Chief