

Editorial

This is yet another issue of our Journal which covers diverse topics from water pollution to rice husk to noise pollution. The last few weeks have seen a lot of happenings in the global scenario.

A detailed discussion seems to be taking place among global political leaders regarding finding a common ground for the planned Paris Agreement. It is still a long way. Due to global politics regarding Nuclear Suppliers Group, there seems to be political polarisation on the environment front.

The point of concern for India is the current monsoon. June rain was below normal though weather pundits say it will be overall above normal rain; it remains to be seen how realistic it is going to be.

The snapshot shows the global water stressed areas along with a suitable poem to recognise the importance of water in politics and society. The news compiled from various global domain appear to suggest many nations take pro-active stand in their own efforts to protect their environment.

It is a good sign and let us encourage the same.

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read 'V. Subramanian', with a long horizontal line extending to the right.

(V. Subramanian)

Editor-in-Chief

July 1, 2016