

EDITORIAL

The three articles contained in this issue of Education for information are all edited versions of papers presented at the International Conference on Technology and Education in Library and Information Science. This Conference was held in Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia, in May 1984, and included a number of participants from abroad as well as those from the host country. The papers ranged over a wide spectrum of issues relating to education and training and contain much food for thought.

A very small number of people are able to attend this kind of conference, and therefore it is useful that the papers should be published. It is now common practice for the organizers of conferences to publish the collected papers in a volume of proceedings to facilitate dissemination rather than relying upon individual authors to seek publication for their own contributions. Unfortunately, however, published conference proceedings often have a small circulation and can be difficult to identify and obtain. It therefore seems a valuable service for selected papers to be re-published in journals which can reach a wider market. Several conference papers have already been re-published in earlier issues of Education for information, and we hope to continue this practice in the future
