

Editorial

After almost twenty years of our role as Editors-in-Chief of the Journal of Computer Security, we have decided it is time to step down and pass the leadership of the journal into new hands. We are pleased to announce that we have found capable and willing replacements who will work together as co-Editors-in-Chief: John Mitchell, Stanford University, and Pierangela Samarati, University of Milan. We anticipate that they will develop plans to shape the journal in a way that respects the high standards and pre-eminent role of JCS to date, and carries it forward to thrive in the future.

It has been a source of great satisfaction to see the journal grow from four issues a year to six, and see how many influential articles have been published in it. We are grateful to those who encouraged us to begin JCS two decades ago, and to our excellent publisher, to the leading researchers who contributed their fine papers, to the hardworking members of our editorial board past and present, and to the unsung army of referees who contributed their time and expertise to maintain the quality of papers in JCS and the computer security community.
